

Until independent ISPs are allowed to offer their services over existing Cable lines the much touted "high-speed" internet will remain a pipe dream for millions of consumers. The prices set by the cable companies are prohibiting too many people from taking part in the information age. Allowing more competition in the market will help to drive prices down for the consumers.